

or raw meat. It doesn't matter what, so long as you keep him hanging around the house. For jealousy is the faithful hound of love and should be as unshakable as Fido, the wolf at the door, is for most of us most of the time.

Frances Starr, now twinkling in "The Secret," a play which pictures the havoc wrought by a wife's jealousy in her own life and in the lives of others, entertains these opinions.

"A little jealousy is an excellent thing in marriage," she remarked to me the other day. "It is the spice of domesticity, don't you think so?"

"If it is, more power to it," I answered, "for one of the things that every woman knows and doesn't tell her husband is that unmitigated domesticity is about as spicy as a boiled dinner."

"A little jealousy is an excellent thing," she reiterated. "Moreover, men expect it of us. I don't think there is anything a man enjoys more than a jealous scene made by his wife, unless it is a jealous rage into which he has worked himself. A good wife should provide her husband with both sensations. Jealousy is to marriage what competition is to trade or was until the trusts did away with competition."

"But, after all, isn't marriage itself a sort of heart-trust, which, from its very nature as a monopoly, shuts out competition?" I interrupted.

"Actual competition, yes," Miss Starr replied, "but not the appearance of it. I am very sorry for the wife who doesn't know enough to be jealous of her husband or at least to pretend to be, and I admit it must be difficult sometimes to be jealous of a perfectly trained husband with whom she eats breakfast and dinner 365 days in the year.

"But she must do the best she can. Her husband expects it of her, and he will be very much disappointed if she doesn't provide him with a jealous pang or two on his own account."

THE CALF

He was one of those fresh young men, given to the use of stale slang. At the breakfast table, desiring the milk, he exclaimed:

"Chase the cow down this way, please."

"Here, Jane," said the boarding-house mistress, "take the cow down to where the calf is bawling."—N. Y. World.
